

Why would you need ERP?

There are many reasons why businesses are choosing to migrate to a new ERP solution and each business is unique but here are a few of the most common motivators behind changing.

- Major changes to your business and its processes will affect the stability and suitability of your existing ERP system.
- Access to information about your business is limited or can take time to collate due to it being stored on many different systems.
- Accounting and other processes take longer than necessary and result in a less-productive workforce.
- Customer satisfaction and sales are suffering due to the lack of knowledge and information available to your staff to make quicker decisions.
- The cost of maintenance is spiralling and your existing system is outdated.
- You are using a bespoke system and the supplier is no longer available.
- There's a lack of flexibility in the system to support growth.
- You want to trade abroad and have no multi-lingual or multi-currency capabilities.
- Information sharing across the business is by word of mouth.
- Your aging system is no longer supported by the vendor/author or by new operating systems.

When will you need to invest in ERP?

There is no definitive answer to that question but if you are experiencing any of the challenges mentioned above and feeling constrained by the functionality of your existing software, then it may be time for you to start reviewing.
